1973 was the year that Lourdes wrestling finally came out of its infancy. It was a year of transition, and the year when the growing pains of seven long seasons paid off at last. It was a year that will not be soon forgotten by those who were involved in it, for the wrestling season of 1973 was a unique and personal experience.

The year will not be remembered for the win-loss record that went with it, for its 7-12 record, though the best in five years, was certainly not outstanding. It will not be remembered as the year in which a twenty-five meet losing streak was broken, for things of that nature are best forgotten. It will not be remembered as the year of a lone superstar, for the team of 1973 was, above all things else, a team, and should be remembered as such. 1973 should be remembered rather as a time in which a bunch of school kids learned to stop doubting themselves and discovered success of a type that went beyond win-loss records...

Perhaps it's difficult to see how any one could become excited over an apparently mediocre year in as obscure a sport as wrestling, but then, if you'd been there, you'd understand.
